On the road to a stron- and useful He moved in circles, but not fashionable or successful ones. The truth is that Hank was worme off than one of submerged, he was submerged and men had to crawl. He was four or five years old then, but he always crawled to the sanshine, and he had the happinest, most pervading, the ticklingest smile radiating from his powerty, his rags and his most wretchedly crippled little body there on the charity room floors. No clampe of sick babies, no sharp word from fired out nurses hurrying by and tripping ever his unwieldly little person, no irritation of nice folia who found charity sometimes going at cross purposes, none of these frowning and untoward happenings ever dimmed the little scamp's smile.

around the floor, siways in the way, never clean, always hungry, uncourt, unlearned, untrained, a little waste human, ward of the charity association, cast off everywhere else, because he was so helpicas, so hopelem, so uncourt and so in the way. He was apparently hopelessly crippled from the waist down. From creeping and shambling about like a seal out of pince, he was overgrown in the shoulders and ghest and had big hands and a great hig wobbly head, while his poor little shanks were withmred and useless. He dragged them around like dried dead twigs. Hank always smilled.

There was no getting around it, Hank always smilled.

There was no getting around it, Hank always smilled as though newers the straightest, most perfect child in town.

bild in town.

Everybody Helped.

Doctors were very kind to him, gladr gave him all they could. He had lectric treatments for his less to try a start the life in them again. A kind boomsker made special shoes and races and gave them to him. El Paso always soft hearted toward the sufficient of little folks when their oubles are known.

But Hank seeing.

troubles are known.

But Hank seemed a hopeless case. He needed all sorts of special treatment and special care and special development and special pattence, and there was no blace in El Pass where he could set it. No one here could do much for little Hank's beef or mind except those especially trained to attend to such to cure and help and train and tend just such little misshaped, warped, broken, half killed lives.

The Good Angel.

But Hank smiled as though life were lives.

The Good Angel.

But Hank smiled as though life were very colden. Along came a friend. She saw Hank. Hank smiled up from the floor where he was wrigging and won a friend. His friend telegraphed to Denver where she had a friend interested in a hospital for just such beipless hopeless waifs.

The Denver hospital most kindly and mercfoldly lelestraphed back that Hank could come there. So a little fund was raised, a want line was put in the svenling paper and a kind woman who was traveling that way undertook the really great hurden of getting alm there safely; for Hank having been paralyzed from babyhood, not pet having entirely left that estate was helpless in everything but his amile. He got to Denver and the Children's Hospital there put him on his feet, made an almost whole boy out of him.

Now Denver sends buck to his hi pass friend a hig hise poster, and it there isn't the breathing image of Hank, only hig, handsome, stury, smilling the same smile only more truth to it, if does not twist the heart so for there is more substance for
